

Eight hundred years ago, beside the great wall of China, there was a ferocious, plague-breathing dragon that lived inside a revolting, unclean lake. Unfortunately, the dragon wasn't friendly. At first, it would breathe fire on a person or animal and they would die on the spot.

Frankly, the of Beijing, gathered up at the king's castle and came up with a plan to keep the dragon away. The king decreed that they would give one citizen to the dragon each month if it left everybody else unharmed. To make it fair, men and women both rich and poor would be chosen out of an urn ready to be sacrificed.

Then one day, thirteen weeks in, the name of the princess was shaken out of the urn. As it was the king's own law, his daughter must be sacrificed. If the king didn't agree to this then the people wouldn't agree to this law as well. Hundreds of thousands of people gathered around and offered him gold and treasures to spare her from the dragon. Sadly, the king told the princess, "Sorry but I shall never see you again."

